No matter which country you are in, which gender you are, or which culture surrounds you, nursing is a remarkable, respectable, and noble profession. A nurse is the person who looks after patients at hospitals, nursing homes, and aged care facilities.

In the past, nursing has had a very basic, preliminary, and gentle routine. However, year by year the demands on nurses and the level of technology they have had to deal with has been escalating. There are currently many opportunities for nurses in the health care sector. Therefore, nursing is a highly demanded and respected subject at universities and other institutions around the world.

Nursing is a profession that entails caring for patients in health and illness, and these aspects of life are studied and practiced by every nurse. This is the basic realm of the nursing profession. For instance, if a nurse looks after a client with great deal of attention, and if the nurse has a good ability to understand clients' humour and listen to their observations, they are called caring. Without these qualities, a nurse is not able to care for a patient any longer. In my opinion, a nurse has to be able to involve themselves with their clients, whenever they need the nurse's help.

If a client's physical and emotional functions are diminishing, it is due to the illness. Health is every person's previous experience; therefore, illness is completely different from health. Health is the consistency of physical and psychological well-being in order to maintain internal and external environmental processes.

I love to work with people who are in hospitals and other health care facilities. When I was a child I had an ambition to be a doctor, and I think this is the way to get there, because nursing has intricate links to other health care professions. I chose Australia as I believed it to be a good country to study nursing in before I started the course. Before I started my studies I thought that the nurse was the doctor's helper, however, this is not the case. The nurse is not so much the doctor's helper as the doctor's coordinator. Nursing is much more complicated in scope than it appears.

In Australia, there are many regulations and conditions to be observed prior to going into the nursing profession. I never had any idea about it before I started my course; I thought that when we finished our studies we could easily work in hospitals. However, the situation is really different in Australia: we have to follow regulations and conditions, and we also must register under the Queensland Nursing Council (QNC) every year. Not only that, but we are required to study health and safety policies and other studies relevant to the nursing profession. Thus, once I study nursing in Australia at this level of detail, I can become a prominent person in our society.

In my work, I will follow these regulations and conditions and I hope to do my best to be a well-known nurse as well as a good person. In general, this is the time in which nursing is invading all health care sectors. Nursing is a science as well as an art; it makes people good and prominent and an evolution of nursing in this millennium is not far away.

There are regulations and policies to be followed by endorsed enrolled nurses (EEN's) before they start their practice in Queensland. There are the specific criteria of the registering body of Queensland, and there is a scope of practice for EEN's that is being introduced by the QNC.
